A Reflection on Loneliness

When Our Inner Worlds Long to Be Met

Loneliness is not always the absence of people.

Sometimes it is the absence of feeling truly seen.

A person may live alone and feel deeply connected to life.

Another may live among family, friends, or within a long-standing relationship and still carry a quiet loneliness within.

- We can share a house without sharing our thoughts.
- We can share meals without sharing our feelings.
- We can spend years beside someone without fully discovering the world they carry within.

And perhaps they have not fully discovered ours.

Over the past few days, I have been reflecting on what loneliness really means.

I am beginning to wonder whether loneliness is sometimes the distance between the life we carry within and the life we are able to share with another.

The Places We Retreat To

When loneliness visits, we often look for somewhere to retreat.

- For some, it is work.
- For others, endless busyness, social media, hobbies, books, television, or a private world of imagination.

These places are not necessarily harmful.

- Work can offer purpose.
- Books can open new worlds.
- Creativity can nourish us.
- Solitude can give us room to reflect and settle.

The difficulty may arise when these places become our only refuge, when they no longer restore us to life but gradually replace the connections we long for.

And sometimes we may not even recognise what is happening.

We simply become accustomed to living alongside others while keeping much of ourselves elsewhere.

The Quiet Longing to Be Known

Perhaps loneliness is not always asking us to find more people.

Sometimes it is inviting us to look more closely at the relationships already present in our lives.

One question has stayed with me:

Who is genuinely interested in my inner world, and whose inner world am I genuinely interested in?

It is an uncomfortable question, because it asks us to look in both directions.

- We may long for someone to understand us.
- But how often do we pause to understand them?
- We may wish someone would ask about our thoughts, our hopes, our disappointments, or the questions that occupy our minds.
- But do we offer that same curiosity in return?

And perhaps there is another question.

- Have we made room for others to discover us, or have we gradually learned to keep our inner lives hidden?

There may be many reasons for doing so.

- Sometimes we have not found the words.
- Sometimes earlier attempts to share were met with indifference or judgement.
- Sometimes the other person is simply unable to meet us in the way we hoped.

And sometimes we ourselves are still discovering what we feel.

- Not every silence means a lack of love.
- Not every distance means a lack of care.

Yet these distances can still leave us feeling lonely.

The Gift of Compassionate Curiosity

I have come to appreciate that one of the greatest gifts we can offer another person is not necessarily advice, solutions, or agreement.

It is compassionate curiosity.

To ask, "How are you?" and genuinely make room for the answer.

To say, "Tell me what has been on your heart."

To listen without immediately correcting, comparing, explaining, or trying to fix.

To allow another person's experience to be different from our own.

We do not have to understand everything.

We do not even have to agree.

Sometimes it is enough to communicate:

Your inner world matters to me, even when I do not fully understand it.

Perhaps this is one of the quietest expressions of love.

Not possessing another person's world.

Not demanding entry.

But remaining willing to discover it, whenever they are ready to share.

Learning to Be With Ourselves

Yet there is another relationship that deserves our attention.

The relationship we have with ourselves.

When we become uncomfortable with our own company, we may begin asking others to fill every silence.

We may look for reassurance, distraction, attention, or constant companionship.

But being alone need not mean being abandoned.

- A quiet walk.
- An afternoon of reflection.
- A book that awakens a question.
- A moment in the garden.

The freedom to sit without needing to accomplish anything.

These can become nourishing experiences rather than empty spaces to escape.

And perhaps, as we become more comfortable with our own company, we begin relating to others with greater freedom.

Not because we no longer need human connection.

We do.

But because we are learning that our inner life also deserves our own companionship.

Solitude may become a place of nourishment, even while our longing for meaningful connection remains.

When Two Inner Worlds Meet

Perhaps connection is not measured by how much time we spend together.

Nor by how many people surround us.

Perhaps it grows in those moments when two people are willing to meet beyond their familiar roles.

- Beyond the parent and child.
- Beyond the husband and wife.
- Beyond the friend, colleague, or neighbour.

For a moment, two human beings become curious about one another.

One shares.

The other listens.

- Something is received.
- Something is understood.

And perhaps something within both begins to settle.

There may still be differences.

There may still be loneliness from time to time.

No relationship can meet every need, and no person can know another completely.

But even a small moment of genuine connection can remind us that our inner lives need not remain entirely unshared.

Perhaps the answer to loneliness is not simply to surround ourselves with more people.

It may also be to cultivate a deeper relationship with ourselves and a more compassionate curiosity towards those whose lives touch ours.

And perhaps we can begin with one simple question:

Whose inner world have I not taken the time to discover?

May we find the courage to care for our own inner lives.

May we find people with whom we can share something of who we are.

And may we remain gentle enough to recognise that others, too, carry worlds we have yet to discover.

Atmadeva Devatma

The Living Wisdom of Arriving